NET Runtime Version: .NET Framework 4.7.1 Discription: Managed (CIM version 2.0) classifier. source: I have posted a support query on the Microsoft site about this (but there is no official patch for this particular issue. A: A UWP application is sandboxed to only use the user's input devices, so it is not able to read keyboard input from other applications, unless those applications are running as services. Since the OP's situation is not a typical one (UWP app as a child application), the only workaround I can suggest is to use an elevated shortcut. This is a custom shortcut that runs the app as an administrator when it is run, thus bypassing the restriction that UWP apps can only use their own input devices. To create such a shortcut, you need to open the start menu, select "Customize", and open the "Advanced" tab. This will open the "Create a new shortcut" dialog. You then need to select "File location", navigate to the desired location for the shortcut, and in the "shortcut location" textbox, add "shell::interactive". After that, you can use "Create shortcut" and use the new shortcut as you normally would. The RAV4 (Image: Toyota) Toyota is keen to get more people to consider the virtues of hybrids - including us, but they know we're not all going to be eco-warriors or grass-roots activists. So Toyota is offering incentives to get more RAV4s on the road. To demonstrate the advantages of a hybrid, the carmaker has taken three LA drivers and followed them around a few months, recording what each said, listened to how they drove, and then used the data to develop a better, more eco-friendly model of the car, according to the company. It's an impressive idea - and Toyota claims it has the car the consumer would buy. The only problem is that these three people aren't even Toyota buyers - they are merely test drivers for the company's product development team.
